

As times changed, around the 1960s, the fifth-generation owner, Juhei, who shared the same name as the founder, began focusing on the cultivation of igusa.

He established a unique method of aging dried igusa in a storehouse. Tatami-omote woven from this aged igusa became highly regarded in the Kanto region and came to be known as “Juhei-omote.”